A student's overall confidence in achieving academic goals is what educational self-efficacy means. This 5-question scale measures how students feel about their ability to succeed academically, without focusing on a specific subject or profession. If you're interested in assessing self-efficacy within a particular field, consider using the Self-efficacy in discipline scale instead. This scale for measuring educational self-efficacy is recommended because it's been validated and proven reliable. It was adapted from the Harvard-Panorama Student Perception Survey and follows best practices in questionnaire design as outlined by us. You might want to modify this scale for your own assessment needs, and we've provided guidance below to ensure you do so correctly. Before making any changes, please review our FAQs and guidelines on questionnaires.
